Spirit Masks of the Old Coastal Bering Sea Yupik Culture "Two-Headed Walrus"

The Coastal Bering Sea Yupik people believed that every object, whether living or natural, had some form of a spirit called atlu. There were people, animals, and inanimate objects.

The walrus mask is made of walrus skin and walrus tusk. The spirit, portrayed as a human face, is shown on the back or the front of the mask. The spirit of strength is the center of the mask, and everything revolves around it, and as being continuous and stimulating. The old person or the elder at the top is the source of all information where the physical and moral strength comes from.

The sticks attached to the mask, the two hoops, and the appendages (small figurines) are many different things.

The two hoops symbolize the four seasons: Fall (left); Winter (upper right); Spring (lower right); Summer (lower left). The four vertical and horizontal sticks attached to both hoops represent the four directions: North (top); South (bottom); West (left); and East (right). The inner hoop represents the earth and the outer, the skies and the sea.

Lastly, various appendages represent certain themes: Circles, some with dots, symbolize the male and female power: For the male, a solid dot at the center; female, a small circle at the center. The four vertical sticks symbolize the four directions and the four seasons.
